ASSP common interest group communities provide members an accessible, virtual and diverse network of peers brought together by shared experiences to become better safety professionals and promote inclusive safety cultures.

About ASSP's Common Interest Groups

Our common interest groups represent occupational safety and health professionals from different age groups, ethnic backgrounds and genders to facilitate their collaboration with one another, encourage their interest in the EHS profession, and promote their success and recognition within the industry.

Membership in our common interest groups is open to all ASSP members – it is not exclusive to those who share a particular identity. Many members join these communities to learn more about people they work with but may not share a background with; build their knowledge and ability to be an ally and more inclusive safety leader; and gain insight and understanding from different perspectives so they can improve their practice of safety.

The Benefits of Belonging to a Common Interest Group

As part of your ASSP membership, you have the opportunity to join any or all common interest group communities at no additional cost, allowing you to experience many benefits:

- Share and seek knowledge through mentoring services; virtual education opportunities; and in-person gatherings at annual meetings
- Expand your network of diverse EHS professionals and develop understanding that will help you become a more inclusive safety leader
- Have an opportunity to become a common interest group leader to enhance your personal and professional leadership skills, and to potentially prepare you for broader ASSP leadership roles
